"an embarrassment" yesterday after ruling that a 53-year-old cancer patient who tried to help a jilted girlfriend by murdering her with a hammer and cutting her body into pieces had not been motivated by "sexual gratification". The pensioner was cleared of her part in the grisly killing in his Bow area home in June last year. In a split decision in the Old Bailey, judge Victoria Davies said the defendant, who was also convicted of a separate attempted murder, had been "cold-blooded and cruel" and that his version of events "lacked credibility". "He said that he didn't have a motive for killing and dismembering the victim. His single explanation of motive was to be 'in the mood' for something. "There is no support for that explanation, which was given at such an unreliable and implausible level as to be totally incredible." Jurors at the Old Bailey had heard that

"He wanted to feel that she was in anguish. He wanted to inflict pain on her. He wanted to try and take her to that hell house, to try and see how she'd feel. "He was not in love with her. He wanted to humiliate her." The judge said that Hussain knew the
