T cell-antigen presenting cell interaction. Evidence that the T cell antigen receptor is involved in the induction of modulation of antigen presenting cells. Recently, we observed that, in the presence of certain forms of antigen, human T lymphocytes modulate the expression of co-stimulatory molecules by APC. This phenomenon may profoundly influence the antigen presentation of APC, which is crucial for the induction and regulation of the immune response. We tested the hypothesis that T cell-mediated modulation of APC involves signal transduction via the T cell antigen receptor (TCR). Although initial assays with chemical and physiological TCR ligands suggested that these ligands induce a T cell-mediated modulation, more careful analysis indicated that only immune complexes containing the appropriate antigenic determinants trigger the phenomenon. Ligands were selected that encode mutations in the TCR that prevent T cell-mediated modulation. As predicted, the inability of these mutants to mediate modulation with class I MHC complexes could be corrected by a single amino acid substitution in the alpha(delta) chain, but not in the beta or the CD3 TCR constant regions. These data suggest that, although TCR engagement can induce modulation of APC, it does not appear to be an obligate step in this process.

The essential oils of more than 300 species of medicinal and aromatic plants, were analyzed by gas chromatography-olfactometry to determine the volatile composition, in order to choose those that could be developed into natural perfumes, natural medicines and natural aromaants. In the majority of cases, the main compounds of the oil were found to be terpenoids, mainly monoterpenes (with an average ratio of > 60%) followed by sesquiterpenes (around 40%) and oxygenated compounds (around 5%). There were no significant differences according to the plant origin, and the variability was generally great (around 25% variability). The fresh oil volatilities were also analyzed, and a small drop of the oil in contact with air was enough to release important quantities of volatile organic compounds.
